WINSLOW, ARIZONA

The City of Winslow is the largest community in Navajo County, and has enjoyed a steady growth in population and importance ever since its founding in 1880.

Winslow was established as a station on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad when the transcontinental line was built, and has retained its importance over the years because near Winslow is a never-failing water supply in Clear Creek.

During the years that steam locomotives were used on the railroad, which became the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe before the turn of the century, a permanent water station was of major importance.

Since the coming of Diesel powered locomotives the water station no longer is important for the railroad, but is of immense importance to the lumbering industry and to the community for its domestic and industrial uses.

The first municipal government was organized in 1900 when Winslow was incorporated as a Town, under the laws of Arizona. A few years later it qualified as a City, and was changed from town to city, operating under the state laws pertaining to mayor and council municipalities.

In 1957 the people voted to adopt a charter type of government, and in the early spring of 1958 elected their first mayor on a separate ballot, and began operations as a charter government.

The community has grown from a small frontier town, serving the railroad and livestock interests of the late 19th century, to a modern city of more than 10,000 people in 1958, with an economy based on the railroad, the lumbering industry, and the vast tourist business developing because of U. S. Highway 66 and the transcontinental air route on which Winslow is located.

Winslow has always been a trading center for the Hopi and Navajo Indians to the north, and with the improvement of highways, is expected to become even more important in this respect.

Opening of the recreational area in the mountains to the south, along the Mogollon Rim, has made Winslow one of the most important points in the greatly expanding hunting and fishing activities of northern Arizona.

The Winslow Memorial Hospital, in its fifth year of operation, is pleased to publish this city directory for Winslow.
